Media Reporting

by

As we end another week we find the mainstream media is still doing their best reporting on all that is good and uplifting. With all the tragedies erupting over the last few months and innocent children kidnapped, molested and murdered, one would think there would be something better to bring before us than a lady who got cold feet before her wedding and decided to “hop a bus outta town.” Of course, it was natural with all our paranoia over spouse and child murderers that the first thing that came to mind when Jennifer Wilbanks ran away was that her fiancé John Mason had done away with her in some dastardly way... especially when the cable guys told us he had not agreed to take a polygraph (lie detector) test. Why, no one refuses to do that unless they're guilty... right?

Now we are being deluged with the question, “Will Jennifer be prosecuted and made to pay the huge costs incurred searching for her body, or will she and John try to get back to some semblance of normalcy in their lives? Does he really want her anymore?” I heard on two radio talk shows they were taking a poll on the web trying to determine when, if ever, she would appear on Oprah to explain her actions to the world. My take... who really cares?

C'mon folks, get a life. Some really serious questions are facing this country and we need to talk about them. First on the list... child predators and female teachers taking sexual liberties with their underage students. Could both these types be listed under the same category as “undesirables?” Will these teachers have to register as sex offenders and notify the law when they move from place to place? Are they as great a threat to society as those who kidnap and murder? Could be.

I read recently that the administrators of Marion County, FL, which is right around the corner from where I live right now, have decided to pass out flyers identifying over 532 registered sexual deviates that live in the county to their neighbors. The state of Ohio is considering a bill to demand that repeat sexual offenders be issued a bright pink license plate so everyone can be warned when the offender drives through the neighborhood. How about if we pass a law mandating that all sexual offenders be issued special license plates identifying them as such with a large letter “S,” standing for “SCUM.” Drastic measures wouldn't you say? My take on the matter is... if an individual is going to act like an animal he or she should be neutered or spayed like an animal. Maybe the thought of castration would slow some of these monsters down, who knows. I think it's worth the effort to try.

The ACLU, of course, feels this is cruel and inhumane treatment and unconstitutional and will do all it can do to strike down any serious attempts to pass such legislation. I wonder what action they would recommend to protect our unsuspecting, innocent, children? Probably none since they also have championed the rights of NAMBLA members to participate in their “constitutional right” to have sex with whomever they choose. For the uninformed, NAMBLA stands for North American Man Boy Love Association. This is a serious challenge before all of us, regardless of where we live, and someone has got to be looking out for the children.

I must make one final observation on another important issue before us, continuing where I left off last week. If you or I were to come upon an elderly person who was struggling for breath and in danger of dying unless life giving oxygen was administered, wouldn't we do all within our power to see that they received that oxygen? Of course we would.

Right now there is a 70 year old social security program that is breathing its last gasp and in dire need of a life sustaining infusion of “oxygen.” Our president is doing everything he can to suggest ways to breathe life into the program to assure that everyone who depends on the benefits the program provides can depend upon them for many years to come. However, many in Washington are saying that no remedy is needed because there is no problem.

Have you noticed that legislation which keeps a person totally dependent upon the government is supported wholeheartedly by the Democrats, but any person who even suggests legislation that might actually allow our citizens to break free from the public dole is overwhelmingly castigated by those same Democrats. Why should they not come up with ideas of their own that will solve the problem rather than consistently shooting down workable solutions that would make Social Security solvent again, and allow younger tax payers the opportunity to create a nest egg for themselves... much larger than can be hoped for under the current plan?

Think about it!
